UNITED NATIONS

The United Nations is an intergovernmental organization.

Intergovernmental organizations are formed between governments of different countries. These types of international organizations are based on formal agreements among countries to come together for a specific purpose or need.

During World War II, the Allied Powers (United States, Great Britain, France, China and the Soviet Union) referred to themselves as "the United Nations". When the war was over, the Allied Powers, or WWII victors, formed a new organization for world peace.

The United Nations was officially established on October 24, 1945 to promote international cooperation. The idea for the United Nations came from the Dumbarton Oaks Conference in Washington, D.C.

Eventually, over 50 countries came together with the goals of improving peacekeeping, security, human rights, justice, the environment, economic development, and humanitarian aid. Member nations agreed to provide military troops to help enforce the peacekeeping decisions of the United Nations.

The name "United Nations", was first used by President Franklin Roosevelt. The United Nations is composed of six main parts: The General Assembly, The Security Council, The Secretariat, The Economic and Social Council, The Trustee Council and the International Court of Justice.

The main headquarters of the United Nations are in New York City. Although the headquarters are on U.S. soil, the land is considered international territory. Today, 193 countries are members of the United Nations.

The biggest part of the United Nations is called the General Assembly. The General Assembly meets from September to December every year to work on world peace and development. Member nations send delegates to the headquarters to hold meetings and talk about global issues.

The September session starts off with a debate. During the debate, delegates from any country can speak in front of the assembly about...
