

FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR

The Seven Years War was fought between Britain and France in Europe. The French and Indian War (1756-1763) was between Britain and France as well, but happened in North America for control of that land. It is considered to be a part of the Seven Years War, although the fighting in North America is known as the French and Indian War. When France expanded into the Ohio River area, Britain declared war. The war was actually fought between the French and the British, both having Native American allies. An alliance is a union formed that agrees to work together for a mutual benefit. The French allied with the Shawnee, Seneca, Ojibwa, Ottawa, and the Algonquin. The British allied with the Iroquois, Catawba, and Cherokee.

In 1606, British citizens set sail for America. They landed in Jamestown in what is now known as Virginia, and started the first settlement. Soon, they settled and controlled the 13 colonies.

France controlled most of the northern territories of North America, which included what is now known as Canada. These regions were known as New France. The region of western Pennsylvania and the eastern Ohio, known as the Ohio River Valley, was wanted by both France and Britain. France wanted to use it for trade since it connected through Canada and the colonies, while the British colonists wanted to create settlements around the area. The area was also a valuable route of trading with the Native Americans.

The French began to build Fort Duquesne (present day Pittsburgh) on the Ohio River even though Britain did not want to give it up. General Washington (colonel in the provincial militia) was sent to force them to leave and stop building the fort. This led to fighting and to what became known as the Battle of Jumonville Glen on May 28, 1754. This was the first battle and marked the start of the French and Indian War. British General Braddock led 1500 men to Fort Duquesne, but they were ambushed (surprise attack) and defeated by French.
