Boston was surrounded by water on three sides and the American Continental army was on the fourth side. Prescott, Putnam, James Frye, and Ebenezer Bridge led the Colonial troops.

The British hoped that the colonists had cannons and wanted to risk losing their ships. The British were trying to gain control of the city of Boston, the sea ports and other land.

The British planned to take over two hills to gain a strategic advantage. American troops got word of the British plans and decided to defend the hills. The British soldiers, or Redcoats, were led by General William Howe and Brigadier General Robert Pigot. British soldiers thought the Minutemen, the American militia, was a group of poor farmers with old muskets and no experience. The Redcoats were armed with muskets and bayonets and far outnumbered the colonists. The American soldiers, or Minutemen, were not a trained army and had to provide their own weapons.
