In 1587, a group of settlers led by John White, arrived at Roanoke. Upon arrival they found the skeletal remains of Greenville's men. Those men decided to stay and build a new life on the new island with their families.

Building a new settlement was a struggle and disputes with the local Native American tribes forced John White to return to England for more supplies. The colonists realized they were not prepared to build a successful colony.

It took White three years to return to Roanoke island. While he was gone his granddaughter was born on Roanoke Island. Virginia Dare was the first child born in the Americas to English parents.

In England, White found very little help for his colony because England was battling with Spain. Due to the Spanish Armada, White was not able to return to Roanoke for three years. Every English ship joined the fight, leaving White with no way of returning to Roanoke.

Before White left the colony he instructed the colonists to carve a Maltese cross on a tree to signal that they were forced to leave.

Three years, when White was able to return to England he found the colony was completely abandoned. No cross was found. White was unable to locate the colony because severe weather hindered his search and forced his return to England. There were no signs of struggle. White assumed the colonists had moved to a nearby island called Croatoan. The only clue left behind was the word "Croatoan" carved into a gatepost and "Cro" carved into a tree. No one ever heard from or saw the colonists again.

Some historians believe that the colonists moved away or further inland. Other historians believe the colonists may have starved to death or were killed by local tribes. Theories also suggest they died of disease or were held captive by the Spanish. Today, the area is called Dare County, North Carolina.
